

Architecture Höggerberg

The Höggerberg Campus was first built in the 1960s, and it has been in constant development ever since. When you visit, you will discover architectural gems nestled into a unique urban environment that is surrounded by forests and fields. As you meander through green spaces with an almost Asian appeal, you witness a productive exchange between academia and architecture. Not only is the Höggerberg Campus an architecturally interesting place, it is also home to the ETH Architecture Department, which has produced famous alumni such as Santiago Calatrava, Jacques Herzog and Pierre de Meuron. The researchers of this department explore how the digital transformation is changing architecture and how robots are revolutionising construction. Would you like a glimpse into their work?
